A label can be regarded as the “primary communication medium” for the product. They convey the message of the product as well as the message of the company.

Between these two vital pieces of information, labels become the “face” of the product and the company. Labels do a great deal to promote and advertise the product of a company. They play an important part to change the minds of the customers helping the establishment achieve its goals a lot quicker than the others. Labels identify quantity, strength, total life and warnings etc. Labels play a great part to increase the rate of sale value of a product.

As we step out into the market, we will come across that all the super markets, grocery stores and shopping malls are overcrowded with a diversity of products competing one another in the market shelves with labels glued on them. These labels have different colors, unique style and design that are ready to attract the customers.

It is a general phenomenon, that the customer get attracted to the product that has a more vibrant color scheme and more attractive design. They go for that product after reading the information details from the label that meet their requirements which they want to have in the article. It will not be wrong to say that labeling a product has become a legal requirement of all the companies introducing their products across the world in general, a label includes

• Name of the product

• Name of the manufacturer and its address (includes the place or country's name)

• Manufacturing and expiry date

• Ingredients and net weight

• A bar code

A label should be able to beautify a product to add to its visual appeal. This can instantly grab the attention of the viewers towards the product. It can raise the level of interest in the mind of a customer towards the product. Keeping all these points under consideration, it is highly important to pay serious attention towards the type of material used for labeling.
