If you've ever watched any of the zombie movies or TV series that have become popular in Edmonton, then you would know that the supposed key to surviving the fictitious zombie apocalypse is simple: stay away from the brain-eating undead people. According to this fanciful lore, the zombie plague is infectious, which is why you need to get away from population centers quickly. With the right tools, you just might survive.

For argument's sake, let's imagine that the zombie plague does happen, and most of the world's population does turn into mindless, bloodthirsty, undead creatures. Would you have what it takes to survive? More importantly, would your car?

In 2011, AOL released a list of cars that would be the best if you want to survive a zombie apocalypse; and at the very top of this list is the Ford F-150. The criteria used to make this list included the following: performance - for outrunning zombies, gas mileage - for when fuel becomes scarce, reliability - because there might not be anyone who could service your car, ground clearance - for running over zombies without getting stuck, and interiors - because surviving an apocalypse is stressful.

While any other truck out there can do a pretty decent job in outrunning zombies, the Ford F-150 was chosen for its V6 EcoBoost engine, which would come in pretty handy when gasoline stations are manned by hordes of horror-movie undead. The four-wheel drive capability of the vehicle would also help you traverse the unforgiving terrain that is most of Canada.

If you have the money, you can also fill your car to the teeth with Ford options that dealerships with trucks for sale Edmonton has can hook you up with. This would include Work Solutions, which lets you do spreadsheets to track your zombie kills while in the car, if that's what your fantasy persona is into. After the apocalypse, if the Internet is still up, the in-vehicle WiFi would also help you locate friends, or a safe haven.

You can also drag your friends to dealerships with F-150 trucks for sale Edmonton has and convince them to buy the same car. If they do, Ford's fleet tracking system can help you locate your buddies when those zombies start destroying the world. Watch the movies "there is always strength in numbers.
