If you are a company with some staff to look after it is essential that you get an HSE risk assessment. Many people neglect this essential practice and they can find themselves not only letting down their staff but also contravening some very important legislation.

It is all too easy to think you are covered and that you are up to date on health and safety legislation but, if you neglect to take account of all the facts, you may find that you do not have effective or safe work procedures in place. An HSE risk assessment will be able to help you discover where you can improve your safety standards.

What does an HSE risk assessment involve?

An HSE risk assessment is not an onerous process and it is primarily designed in order to help you and your business to work effectively to provide a safe working environment for your staff. The HSE risk assessment will usually start with an audit of your present health and safety practices and, if any defects are found, there will be a review and a programme of future activity will be written for you.

The review will look at all aspects of health and safety including induction training, safe work procedures as well as first aid training and any other training necessary in order for your work practices to be safe.
