In today's world of commerce, there are as many marketing ideas as there are types of businesses. How you sell your goods and services will determine your company's future. With the rapid advances in science and technology, marketing strategies must keep up with the pace. It is interesting to note that it is the same advances that allow marketing techniques to do just that—mainly with the help of the Internet. The Internet is the one facet of the computer most widely used to promote or enhance a business.

Accordingly, internet marketing, or online marketing, has evolved into a more comprehensive mixture of components that businesses use to increase their sales. It has become an important part of most companies' marketing plans. Basically, internet marketing is used to communicate a company's message about itself and its products or services online. It is also used to conduct research to determine present and future customer profiles. Lastly, it is used by various businesses as a medium to sell goods and services.

Components of internet marketing include setting up a website, which consists of various elements that convey the company's message online. Websites can be considered the internet equivalents of brochures or mail order catalogs used in offline marketing. Another component is search engine marketing. It is marketing a website with the use of search engines, either by improving the site's natural ranking through search engine optimization (SEO), buying pay-per-click (PPC) ads, or purchasing pay-for-inclusion (PFI) listings in website directories. Email marketing is another aspect of internet marketing. It is the method of distributing information about a product or service or gathering feedback from customers through email. It is essentially the online counterpart of direct mail marketing. Other components include banner advertising, online press releases, blog marketing, article marketing, and social media marketing. These various systems assist companies in achieving their different marketing goals and philosophies.
