When a child dies during birth, that is perhaps one of the saddest and most painful things for parents who have long anticipated and cared for the unborn child. Once the parents find out that the ones who caused the dire incident are the medical practitioners who supervised the labor, their grief can intensify. With that, their normal next course of action is to file complaints and hold the involved doctors and staff legally liable.

Nevertheless, complaints against medical professionals are not only applicable in circumstances where infants die because of the doctors' or nurses' inability or neglect. There are also other valid situations that merit legal sympathy and consideration. For these cases, justice should be delivered for the sorrow inflicted on babies and parents, as well as for the lifelong health problems that, oftentimes, can no longer be healed.

Facial Paralysis

There are some surgeons who use forceps and vacuums when performing labors. They do this to make the birthing process faster and easier, especially when it is hard to pull the baby out. Nevertheless, this can cause slight grazes on the infant's scalp, as well as facial paralysis because of the pressured and damaged facial nerves. The infant's scalp and face may also swell, which is only impermanent for some, but become too severe for others that surgery may be needed.

Erb's Palsy

It is also possible to stretch the nerves around the infant's shoulder while giving birth because of excessive pulling out. As a result, Erb's Palsy, or brachial plexus injury, happens. If facial paralysis results from incorrect use of surgical equipment, this can be attributed to inept surgical techniques. Of course, both can be taken to court with the help of a birth injury lawyer Utah residents recommend.

This type of personal injury attorney Utah law firms hire specializes in handling birth injury cases brought about by medical malpractice, negligence, or both. A birth injury lawyer can represent parents and families in a legal arena for the rally against inefficient doctors and medical staff who may have brought on lifelong effects on the well-being of their children, or worse, may have instigated their untimely passing.

There are a number of concerns in investigating birth injury cases in court, including the examination of the mother's pelvis, as well as of the infant's size and condition. This is because there can be other reasons that caused the unfortunate event and not everything can be blamed on surgeons. Despite that, a Utah injury lawyer believes that although medical practitioners have no power to fight natural causes, they ought to have the proper capabilities and knowledge in dealing with every circumstance they will experience in the operating room.
