Who

Those who do professional tax preparation in the states are currently either working in private practice or work with a larger tax preparation company. Generally, these people get training in tax law along with other tax related matters prior to preparing taxes.

Some people who are in this industry include attorneys, certified public accountants, enrolled agents, and others that aren't licensed by any authority. In the future, the IRS will require that all paid preparers pass a national tax law exam and meet continuing education requirements to be able to prepare tax returns for others.

What

The field of professional tax preparation involves individuals who prepare tax returns for individual and business taxpayers. In the simplest version, the tax preparer will simply put in the data from the taxpayer to arrange a return. Other preparers will try to optimize the tax return to gain a larger tax refund or to minimize tax liability with regards to legal tax deductions.

For businesses and high value individuals, tax preparers come up with long term strategies that are designed to minimize taxes wherever possible. This might involve complex schemes that are legal in which more income is often shielded from taxation. Today, it's not unusual to see large corporations that pay less than 5% rate on their own income due to these tax moves.

Why

Many people know that the United States tax laws are complex. That's the reason over fifty percent of all individual tax returns are still performed by professional tax preparation professionals. It is estimated that taxpayers will require over 10 hours of labor in order to do their own return. Many people don't wish to invest that much time or even more in preparing a tax return.

Another explanation why many are uncomfortable with doing their own tax return is that they don't really understand how the tax system works. All they want to do is to submit their forms to some tax preparer and obtain the great news that there is a refund coming. They do not wish to spend the time necessary to read and understand how taxes operate in the United States.

How

The way a professional tax preparation professional works is simple. The idea for the tax preparer would be to see as many clients as you possibly can throughout the day, especially during tax season when demand for tax professionals is extremely high. The paid tax preparer will use computer software to input data rapidly. Using the best tax software for professionals, it can be very quick to create an accurate tax return with minutes.

When the data has been input to the software, the tax preparer will electronically file the return. Many tax preparers are able to print a refund check, especially if he or she offers tax refund loans that permit taxpayers to get a refund on the same day the tax return is filed.
