Jorge and his parents came to Singapore a few years back. Jorge™s father is a banker and his work demands long hours in his workplace and a fair bit of traveling out of Singapore. An intelligent boy, Jorge has been a fairly consistent performer in his class in his school in Spain before they came over to Singapore. He used to get good grades in his class in almost all subjects.

Jorge™s mother, a home maker for most part of her life back in Spain, decided to pick up a job with a local school in Singapore. This meant that by the time all the three are back home at the end of the day, they barely had enough energy left in them to have some quick dinner and then watch the television for a while before retiring for the day. All this was having a substantial impact on Jorge and that showed in the results in his school in Singapore as he did not do well in his first exams. Jorge™s parents attributed the same to the change in curriculum, environment, but when the not so good performance in the earlier exam became a really bad performance in the next exam, Jorge™s parents were alarmed. It was time that Jorge had to be looked after since they could ill afford their son to be an average performer.

While Jorge™s may be an isolated incident and an imaginary one at that, in this day and time in a city like Singapore, as an expatriate, it is crucial that your son or daughter gets the right back up educational attention that she or he deserves. If your son or daughter is a student of the International Baccalaureate curriculum and feel that s/he needs to develop a sense of empathy, a deep knowledge about other cultures and most importantly you want your kid to grow up as a good human being without compromising on education then help is at hand.
