Introduction

The main stream media like to portray gamers as a means of entertainment for the socially challenged. It is true that a small portion of the gaming community like to huddle in the dark with their consoles, firing off their virtual weapons or conquering newer lands. Thanks to the proliferation of social networking websites, games such as Cityville began to gain much prominence. Although it had a quiet start and took its own sweet time to harness attention, Cityville is turning out to be yet another milestone for the parent gaming company Zynga. A brief introduction into this game along with other forms of interesting tidbits will be presented in the following sections. At the end of the day, it is all about user preferences when it comes to gaming.

What Makes Cityville So Appealing?

One of the most appealing aspects of Cityville is that it can be played using your web browser interface. In other words, one need not have to invest on a $2000 personal gaming station to try this game. As of now, you need to have a valid and working Facebook account to enjoy cityville. Finding the game within the interface of this social networking website is easy; just use the search field (usually found at the top portion of your Facebook profile page). This field usually fills itself as soon as you begin typing the first few letters. As per the terms and conditions laid out by the gaming company, your profile details will be accessed by Cityville. This is an integral step in the installation process; if you try to skip it, you might not be able to enjoy this fine game.

The Role of Reward Points in Cityville

If you are an ardent gamer, who likes to spend time testing various other flavors from Zynga, you will find that Cityville is akin to Farmville. The primary objective reflected throughout the game is to build a city from the basic levels. The player will have options to collect rent, create new buildings and do moderate farming in the land allocated to him. As with the other offerings from Zynga, the game can be played absolutely free of cost. However, if you wish to speed up your progress level, you may have to pay for it – i.e. the premium features of Cityville can be easily unlocked if you have ample cash reserves in your bank account. The chances of your spending additional amounts for this game are high because it gets more interesting with the passage of time.

Can I Visit My Friends And Help Them?

There is an energy timer which replenishes itself according to the current player's skill set. As the player progresses through Cityville, they will get access to additional points, which can be allocated in a judicious manner. As it is a social networking game, there is the provision to visit the nearby areas which are often maintained by your friends. You can also participate in augmenting their progress levels by helping them complete various day to day chores. Those who have a large circle of friends can progress within Cityville easily.
