How to Overcome Feeding Difficulties in Children by Tracey Jones

Article published on August 23rd 2012 | Health

All children are stars in their parents' eyes, especially small babies. Very small babies or the infants have to be given special care and attention in terms of their feeding habits, their hygiene and their safety. Many mothers experience feeding difficulties with their babies.

Breast milk is regarded as the premium food for babies but where a mother cannot breast feed the most common substitute is milk formula.

As infants grow up doctors advise the mothers to feed their children with solid foods. Feeding difficulties can occur in both babies and children. Difficulty settling infants and children is very concerning and frustrating for both mother and baby. Whatever the reason, when the babies start showing their disinterest towards food and the mothers start experiencing feeding difficulties with their babies they may require assistance. Difficulty feeding children can be very interrupting for the family and may take a long time to resolve if not assisted by a professional such as a Cranial Osteopath.

The first and the foremost thing is to consult a good pediatrician. It might be possible that the baby is not showing interest in eating due to some medical health issue. Many times the problem is very small and it gets rectified with simple feeding instructions but in some cases it is possible that the baby is suffering from some complicated disorder such as an anatomical anomaly. This disorder may be characterized by a strong repulsion to accept food. Other characters includes: delay in eating time, refusal to accept a particular texture of the food, showing inability in chewing, gagging or coughing while eating and perhaps vomiting. Not all the symptoms might be seen in a particular child but these are some common ones where the parents face feeding difficulties in their children.

This problem may lead to the difficulty of settling their children. Children showing any of the above symptoms should be taken to a pediatrician. A good pediatrician will study the complete medical history of the children and treat the child accordingly. There are numerous treatments available for different individuals depending on the requirements for overcoming the feeding and swallowing disorder and difficulty feeding the children.
