Cosmetic dentistry is one of the most recent fields of dentistry to emerge in the recent years and in the few years that it has been around, a number of considerable changes and developments have taken place within the field itself. There are very many new procedures that are being practiced today by every cosmetic dentist in the world and most of them involve the use of dental crowns. All of these procedures have the same general objective which is to improve the appearance of patients by modifying or changing their dental structures or actual teeth. Many people all around the world who should benefit from these new procedures are however unable to do so due to the lack of sufficient information regarding the availability of the same.

Dental bridges are among the new procedures that are being performed all over the world in the field of cosmetic dentistry. At this point, a short discussion of what dental bridges are and what they are about should be convenient to shed better light on the issue. In layman's terms, dental bridges can be said to be false teeth that are used to cover up the gap that is left behind by a missing tooth or missing teeth. They are also sometimes alternatively referred to as pontics. Normally, a dental bridge is placed in the middle of two porcelain dental crowns. The dental crowns themselves are normally attached to the teeth of the patients on both sides of the false tooth. The most commonly used bridges are the fixed dental bridges and they cannot be taken out of the mouth once they have been put in place. They are designed to be used for a long time and are not removable in the same manner as the removable partial dentures whose users are normally able to take out at will.

Missing teeth have often been a cause of major concern for the victims for two main reasons. The first reason is because of the resultant difficulties in eating, while the second reason is that it destroys a person's smile, barring him or her from enjoying that perfect smile that every person wishes to have. It is this second reason that cosmetic dentistry aims to solve. In case you have missing teeth and you have decided to get a replacement, then you should talk to a cosmetic dentist about the use of dental crowns and dental bridges. There are also some other bridges known as the cantilever bridges that may be used in less stressed areas of the mouth.
