Our Society and Vitiligo: at a Glance by James Blee

Article published on August 22nd 2012 | Health

Have you ever been forbidden, outlawed or interdicted from the society and religious causes just because of your skin? Well, in case of the patients seeking a cure for vitiligo, it has been a social taboo ever since the first discovery of the diseases in 1st century, A.D.

Patients seeking treatment for vitiligo, life has been filled with social ostracism and social resentment. They have for long been suffering and hurt from the rude comment from friends, family and society. In a country like India with profound medicinal and cultural practices, a man, woman or child suffering from vitiligo was often misjudged by the religious "gurus" to be a culprit of "Guru D" his previous birth. There have been cases of antagonism where instead of a treatment for vitiligo the patients did not even get spouse. There have been situations of extreme hostility where the patient suffering from vitiligo is forced into attempting suicide due to social ostracism.

In the 21st century, the world seems to have woken up to the need to have a better understanding towards the treatment for vitiligo and cure a patient's worries and the society at large from this proscription. Today, there are national societies being formed and set up all across countries like India, USA, UK, Sudan and other South African Countries, Australia and Pan Asia. The major work and motto of these societies for cure for vitiligo is to educate and spread awareness about the diseases.

They work into areas involving the research and development of projects based on bringing in new discoveries for the vitiligo treatment. Re-establishing new thought and hope in the minds of patients and families seeking the cure for vitiligo. The most common phobia among general public is the spread of the diseases while in contact with the patient while it is a clinically proven non-contagious diseases. To established a better knowledge of pathophysiology in vitiligo treatment. Moreover, these vitiligo treatment societies have established international collaboration.
