When buying a new product, let your creativity run wild as you choose an item that is celebrated internationally for its quality and style. Embroidered items still have a special place in many cultures and are a great purchase after all of these years because it can be reinvented very easily into a new fashion trend.

India is famous for its elaborate fashion embroidery as it represents the vibrancy of its culture. Manish Arora, known as India's John Galliano, says that originality is the key to a great fashion statement. India has always been famous for its flowing dresses with its intricate embroidery but its designers do not always do their best to make it more cost-effective to the West. Embroidery although it still is a luxury, can be affordable and brought into the new age.

For instance, many apparel designers in the US have been trying to combine embroidery with eco-friendly pieces of clothing so as to follow the recent trend of sustainability. Loved by celebrities such as Lady Gaga, Katy Perry and Rihanna, Arora has success outside of India due to mixing classic items like embroidered patterns in with innovate, modern designs.

Embroidery is very much still in fashion as Margaret Moorehead who lives in the county of Hampshire, UK has shown. She teaches embroidery classes nationally from the comfort of her home through the internet. Whether through Facebook, newsletters or her website and a free once-a-month seminar, Margaret has managed to make embroidery relevant to today's fashion-obsessed audience.

She has reinvented the simple art of sewing into something unique be involved with. The international love for embroidered items spreads as far as Malaysia where the gold art of embroidery is preserved within the community and used at the royal palaces and at special occasions.
