Window Shutters: Slat Armor for Homes Against Hurricane Attacks by Katie Nicoll

Article published on June 7th 2012 | Home Improvement

Modern windows are strong enough to withstand anything that hits them, especially during a violent hurricane. For some people, however, having a bare window may not suffice to hunker down in such a scene. Not only do they have to close their windows and shut them tight, they have to board them and nail them in.

For that task, you have window shutters that can act like cage armor used by armored vehicles. Just as cage armor deters shaped charges from direct RPG hits, window shutters are designed to do the same thing against rocks and other flying debris. The earliest form of window shutters go way back to ancient times, perhaps before glass even made it to window openings. It was their way of controlling the amount of light and air in the house back then.

Contrary to popular belief, many modern window shutters aren't made out of pure wood; but the wood is the core of the shutter. The wooden core is covered in layers of polyresin, a resin that is known for its durability and extensive use in making sculptures. The result is a harmonious mix of resilience and style for any suburb.

Due to the polyresin coating, modern window shutters don't need to be scraped and painted for years. The polyresin coating helps window shutters maintain their beauty even under conditions that can damage it such as the weather and pesky termites. After all, termites won't eat wood that's been treated with synthetics.

While most hurricanes hit the eastern seaboard, it can also hit hard on the other side, especially California. Window shutters LA homes have can protect your windows, as well as your house, from gale-force winds and flying debris. Alone, windows can only hold out for so long before the hurricane wrecks it completely. Window shutters are your home's first line of defense against the forces of nature.

With hurricane season fast approaching, perhaps now is the best time to set up the defenses and brace for impact. It is highly recommended to get window shutters along with new window installation Los Angeles contractors do. It may not offer the best protection against insurgents with RPGs, but it may be your ideal bet against everything Mother Nature throws at your home.
