Whilst ceiling fans might once have been fitted and used only in the most affluent households and top class hotels, they have undergone something of a rise and rise in popularity over the past few decades. In hundreds of thousands of homes, business premises, and public places, ceiling fans are now integral parts of interior design, often going hand in hand with home lighting. Consequently, just like many other functional household items that have evolved from the category of luxury, to that of almost necessity, ranges of ceiling fans are now readily available in an impressive variety of designs to suit your own personal tastes and the ambience of each room in your home.

Ceiling fans

and light fixtures can be ticked off your list in one fell swoop, resolving your home lighting and ventilation issues simultaneously, as the fan paddles of most models generally sit above the lights themselves. Similarly to independent light fittings, the range of designs on offer is as long as it is wide. If, for example, you have very minimalist and modern décor in your bedroom, kitchen or lounge, you might opt for ceiling fans in plain black, chrome or white. If your home style is more rustic or period, you might naturally opt for wooden models, or ceiling fans incorporated in to wrought iron lighting.
