The Reasons to Learn Chinese in China by Maureen Hayes

Article published on June 18th 2012 | Language

Whilst you may have learnt French, German or Spanish at school, there are far greater reasons to learn Chinese in China today than there are to learn these languages. It is true that Chinese can be a tough language to learn, but this is made far easier by deciding to learn Chinese in China as opposed to learning it just from a textbook in your own country. This is not the only reason to learn Chinese in China though, as this article can attest to by taking you through the variety of reasons why learning this important language in its native region is so important. Here are the top three reasons to learn Chinese in China.

1. Daily exposure. Whenever your language teachers go on about learning a language in an immersive environment, you should really, truly listen to them. This is the most important part of learning a language. You may struggle to learn your French vocabulary in class, but if you become immersed in an environment learning the language is far easier. This is why the decision to learn Chinese in China rather than anywhere else is crucial.
2. The culture is the language. Although culture is important in all languages, in Chinese this is even more important because of the vast differences between Western and Eastern culture. It is said that if you don't truly understand Chinese culture, you cannot truly understand the nuances of Chinese language. The only way to really experience this culture is to learn Chinese in China, as you will be exposed to the culture more often and in a more authentic way. Do not think that your local 'Chinatown' is a good substitute for this; these neighbourhoods often combine many Asian cultures, different Chinese dialects outside of Mandarin Chinese and the influences that inevitably come from being based firmly within Western society.
3. Language needs to be fun. Learning in a classroom is important for any subject, because you need the theoretical and academic basis on which to build. However, just learning Chinese in this way will not give you the encouragement to continue. You need a variety of different situations in which to study Chinese, and nothing can beat the variety you get if you learn Chinese in China. This is because the entire country is your classroom, and you can learn things every minute of every day. From taking the bus to class and ordering lunch to negotiating with a street vendor and paying your bills at the bank, the opportunities to practice when you learn Chinese in China are endless.

Although you may not have considered even learning Chinese, it is a language that will certainly become important in the future for businesses around the world. With that being said, it is important to learn a difficult language in a place where you can progress more quickly and really immerse yourself in both the language and culture. This is why the perfect solution for those who want to learn Mandarin is to learn Chinese in China.
