Article published on February 23rd 2012 | Law

There are many issues involved with people facing asbestos exposure. There are laws that govern the manner in which asbestos should be handled. These laws help to ensure workers who handle asbestos are efficiently protected against exposure and that the manufacturing, handling, transportation, and disposal of this hazardous material is managed accordingly.

While there are laws in place, there are still many companies and manufacturers that do not follow these laws completely. Despite knowing that asbestos can be harmful to a person's health, there are many who still prefer to take shortcuts to save a few dollars. The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) have ensured that these laws are applicable on a state and national level.

However, reputable law firms like Baron and Budd can help protect the rights of mesothelioma patients who have contracted mesothelioma from asbestos exposure. They continuously attempt to inform employees about their rights to know the manner in which asbestos can harm them and what they can do if they are exposed. Employees can seek compensation from manufacturers of asbestos in case there are issues with their health due to an unsafe work environment.

Baron and Budd is extremely concerned with the exposure levels that have been defined by these laws. The exposure limit is set at one tenth of one fiber per cubic centimeter of air. This company knows that this is the exposure limit allowed for a period of 30 minutes.

The reputable lawyers at this firm are also aware of the manner in which these exposure limits should be calculated. This eliminates confusion regarding data that can be used in lawsuits against manufacturers. After having fought innumerable cases related to asbestos poisoning and mesothelioma, they are aware of the manner in which data can be twisted to suit the defendant.

Aspects such as record keeping, employee gear while handling asbestos, and other safety measures that have been made necessary are taken into consideration. If you choose Baron and Budd to seek claims with an asbestos manufacturer, you will rest assured they are diligent in their understanding of the possible issues of the case.
