The Basics of Personal Injury Law: What You Need to Know by Anderson

Article published on February 8th 2012 | Law

No matter how careful people are in their daily routines, accidents and the subsequent injuries are still a common occurrence today. There is evidence of these on the news within the television, radio, newspapers and other media outlets, making them an inevitable part of everyone's lives. Despite this, the resulting pain and confusion that comes with an accident can be unbearable, especially if the accident or injury happens to a person's loved one.

This is usually true when other people could have acted reasonably to prevent the accident if not for their carelessness. A person whose loved one got involved in an injury-inducing accident must undergo certain steps in the legal process. Nevertheless, he or she may have inquiries regarding the legal process. It is then important to know some of the relevant information about "personal injury" cases.

"Personal injury" is a legal term that refers to any injuries to the body, mind or emotions. A personal injury case is a legal dispute that can happen if the person suffers physical or mental damages from a mishap or was caused by someone else who could be legally responsible for the accident or injury. There are two ways on how a personal injury case can be resolve: through a formal lawsuit or through an informal settlement.

In a formal civil court lawsuit, the injured party or the claimant should first file a complaint against the defendant. The defendant can be a person, business, corporation, government agency or any collective group. The claimant must allege that the defendant acted carelessly in the accident, which caused injuries. Court judgment either from the judge or from the jury is the basis for the decision in terms of damages compensation.

Most personal injury cases, however, are decided through informal settlements. Establishing fault is still the focal point of the case, but the decision does not come from a judge or jury. Instead, both parties, including their insurance providers and legal representatives, will have to agree on a certain decision that will satisfy them both . The resolution of the case takes place when both parties sign an agreement that will prevent an action, such as filing a lawsuit.

A person who suffers from an injury due to someone else's carelessness can easily hire a personal injury attorney Los Angeles. The reputable attorney's expertise will guide the claimant through either a formal lawsuit or an informal settlement. The experience of the said legal representative will also enable the claimant to know how much his or her case is worth and how much damage recovery he or she is entitled to receive.
