Gold-plated retirement scheme closed in UK by Look Right

Article published on February 3rd 2012 | Loans

A new survey from the Pension Protection Fund has again shocked the arena of employees, stating that the companies in UK have decided to close their Gold-Plated retirement scheme and about 1012 out of 6400 final salary office plans stays opened for the staffs. It is about two hundred plans lesser than one year before.

The decline means that about 4 laces lesser staffs have access to the munificent retirement schemes. The vast majority of the Final Salary Retirement plans operated by the companies has either been stopped to the new employee or is in the course of being wound up. Companies have deactivated the plans, which are also recognized as Defined Benefit Plans, because they are very costly to operate. The income at the end of retirement is based on their final wages, as the scheme defines its policy. The pensions are mostly compensated for the firms.

Companies are progressively more switching the retirement plans they cater to the cheaper called Defined Pension Plan, in which deposits are found on contributions from the both end - company and employee. Even though the plans are more inexpensive to operate for the firms they can also be less munificent in which they deposit, referring that the employees are about to find the shoddier retirement benefits. The present firms to declare the shutting down of their final salary plans are Unilever, Boots and Shell. The data have been contained in the Purple Book of Pension Protection Fund, a yearly picture of the English final salary plans.
