While a vocal dialogue is certainly not effective to convey the content of a narrative, a musical theater that supports it with acting and music is very powerful. A musical theater can start in several techniques, like with an overture or with an impressive rendition of an excerpt of a distinct theme.

The ensemble is probably the most recognizable scenes in virtually any musical play. This tremendous number in the first play is an exposition or a basic incident. The exposition determines the setting and key players, while the initial incident brings out the conflict and allows everything else in the plot. This lively number includes the protagonists and major secondary roles, with a group of background characters scattered in from time to time.

The ballad is a slow tune that conveys a figure's strong affection, yearning, or sorrow. Sometimes sung by the protagonist to soft musical accompaniment, normally with strings and/or piano. A musical may have a number of ballads sung by different big characters.

A duet number may or may not be a ballad. If it is a ballad, it is classified as a love song. There are normally more duets than solos in a musical since these contain a vocal discourse between 2 players that run the plot forward.

The classic charm tune is an active portion within a courtship scene. Usually a duet, a charm song determines resemblances and disparities between a pair of characters in a partnership. The scene where this song is carried out may also play with customary archetypes relating to gender functions and gender conflicts. It challenges those finding out how to write a musical because individual character progression should be thought about.

Serious writers discovering how to write musicals also require to arise with a special humorous song to supply gentle interludes. Comic relief is often inserted in the course of the second act of a story, where the strain from the rising conflict is briefly broken with humor. This generally consists of a collection of supplementary figures that raise the lighter items of the struggle and provide a source of enjoyment to the suffering main players and the viewers.

A contemporary complaint song, executed sometime in the third act close to the climax or the denouement of the plot, may or may not be an ensemble song or a ballad reprise. This music deals with interpersonal problems associated to the plot, especially if the musical is billed with present-day interpersonal issues. Perhaps the most emotional scene in a musical, this song is accompanied with loud, swelling audio.
