

Article Side

Evaluating the Touch and Tone of Used Steinway Pianos and Secondhand Yamahas
by Rosa Davis

Article published on February 9th 2012 | Music

Pianos have always been an instrument associated with classical music and timeless pieces. Their enchanting immortality grows even stronger if played on reputable brands like Yamaha and Steinway. These are some of the most sought-after models not only by pianists, but also by composers and other musicians.

These pianos are like historical recreations constructed from a variety of excellent wood types and crafted exceptionally by artisans. With the quality and beautiful musicality they can offer, these pianos truly deserve to be the big investments they are. Nonetheless, buying newly manufactured Yamahas and Steinways is not the most practical option today. Classic musicians and music aficionados can still get a good deal with previously owned models.

No matter how durable these piano brands may be, they are still susceptible to damage and prone to wearing out. This can affect the quality of touch and tone they originally had. For that reason, collectors and other buyers should be meticulous with the secondhand pianos they want to purchase.

In looking for the best used piano deals, one should begin by scouting for the most reliable providers of used Steinway pianos and secondhand Yamaha keyboards. These suppliers can surely offer nothing but instruments that are in perfect working condition and that are available at reasonable costs. Although they are already credible sellers, buyers are still advised to personally try and play the pianos they want to buy.

To inspect a used Yamaha piano or used Steinway keyboard, try to press all the keys to test whether they still work. Afterwards play some easy notes and then a full chorus. You can tell by touch and tone whether a unit is still in excellent working condition or needs to be repaired and updated. Watch out for resistance of the keys to the fingers, as well as difficulty in getting the keys to make a sound. If the tone sounds broken or stilted, the unit might need greasing or replacement of certain parts.

Thankfully, there are reliable providers of used Steinway pianos and Yamaha keyboards that offer nothing but the best piano brands and models. The wood of the units they retail are cured, cleaned, and polished thus, appearing newly manufactured. They also offer a warranty valid for a decade to assure their most valued clients of long lasting durability. Minor greasing up and major repairs can be covered without additional fees. These previously owned pianos not only give buyers the chance to play at half the cost, but also with the opportunity to save a tree and help the environment.

Article Source:

<http://www.articleside.com/music-articles/evaluating-the-touch-and-tone-of-used-steinway-pianos-and-secondhand-yamahas.htm> - Article Side

Rosa Davis - About Author:

Come visit us at www.ontariopianos.com for more information.

Article Keywords:

used steinway pianos, used yamaha piano

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!