Surviving the city requires a great deal of adjustment. A typical city resident must cope with traffic, peace and order concerns, over population, and the challenge to perform as much work possible in any given 8-hour shift. However, residing in the city is not without perks and other benefits.

A lot of the outstanding educational institutions and shopping malls can be found in the city. For those who want to join the corporate world, a lot of companies have their offices in key cities. Because of the growing number of individuals who prefer to reside in the city, local governments have to frequently find solutions to solve the challenge of space. High-rise living spaces, or condominiums, are a remedy to this dilemma.

A condo is a type of property where individual ownership is provided to a part of the real estate while the use of common amenities like the hallways and elevators are shared by the homeowners' association members. Either the owner or his/her tenants may inhabit the condos. These renters pay rent to the owners depending on the contract of lease authorized by both parties.

The members of the homeowners association's board of directors, who are selected by the unit owners, handles the condo. The association decides the amount each owner has to pay to maintain the common areas like the swimming pool or playground. The association has the right to collect these payments.
