Article published on February 24th 2012 | Sports

As a sport, golf is often said to be much closer to chess than to basketball or volleyball. That's because golf is largely a mental game, and one's ability to focus can have measurable impact on the outcome of a game. However, golf is still an active sport, which means physical fitness is equally as important as mental fitness. Golf is a demanding physically, and requires strength, balance, and dexterity. It's true that in golf, "mental" and "physical" are two sides of the same fitness coin.

Stamina and Mental Agility

Many golf trainers advise that mastering the game of golf requires a balanced harmony of physical and mental strength and well being. To be able to perform well, one must have strength, stamina, and focus. For the most part, these can be achieved through good nutrition, exercise, and diligent practice. But a new golf aid is gaining popularity and helping golfers up their game. Golf drinks have been developed to enhance mental and physical performance. The drinks contain science-backed supplements that increase energy and reduce feelings of fatigue – a true golf aid. Whether you're simply practicing your golf swing or competing in an 18-course championship game, golf drinks help you perform your best.

Golf trainers will also recommend that golfers practice mental focus – but focusing can be difficult if you do not feel well physically. Negative factors like stress and depression can also affect concentration and disrupt the ideal balance between physical and mental health. Some golf drinks such as GolferAID not only enhance your physical performance, but also provide a boost to your mental agility, improving focus and your mood. By improving blood flow to the brain, for example, these golf drinks can improve brain activity – another great golf aid!

In golf, focus goes hand-in-hand with overall performance, and the best focus is only achieved by a player who has just the right balance of physical health and mental acuity. In order to maintain both of these and enhance his or her performance on the golf course, a golfer may wish to consume natural supplements. GolferAID is a popular golf aid drink that can help.
