Think of the world when city roads were still filled with horse-drawn carriages that were the first cabs—the world of transportation really has developed since then. Taxicabs became such a regular fixture in city highways through the years that there is a minimum of at least five pop songs released with "taxi" in the title. Additionally, there is a prevalent belief that second only to the barkeep, the cab driver is just one of those few folks (priests, psychologists and hair stylists included) who know a great deal about other folks, owing to the tons of tales he has heard from his passengers.

The taxicab's first form was a hackney carriage that was actually drawn by horses in seventeenth century London as well as Paris. The Hackney Carriage Act (1635) was the earliest taxicab regulation in London that controlled the number of hackney carriages. In the year 1837, "The City," which was the original taxicab business in Toronto, was launched by Thornton Blackburn. While in 1891, Wilhelm Bruhn, a German inventor created the taximeter to determine a traveler's fare depending on the distance covered and time the trip took. Finally, in 1899, gasoline-powered taxicabs started to serve people in Paris. Modern cabs were patterned after the latter.
