How Do Priorities Affect Divorce? by Lily Jaylen

Article published on April 30th 2012 | Divorce

When people look into getting a divorce, they are doing this for many different reasons. One of the top reasons for getting a divorce is that the priorities have changed at some point in the relationship. This is an issue that affects many people. When the goals or expectations that people may have agreed on have changed those goals and expectations, may now be a reason for breaking up. These goals could be in career choices, having children, or even something as basic as doing household chores.

There are many things that can make changes and put strains on a marriage. Some of these things may include: death of a member of the family, medical illness, that mid-life crisis, infidelity, unplanned children and addictions. Listed are just some of the things that could produce an incredible amount of pressure on a relationship. These differences can make changes in the priorities that a couple might have had. These priority changes could be enough for a couple not to be able to deal with and then lead to divorce.

When getting a divorce you will need to make sure that your attorney knows what your priorities are, and you will get the things you want from your divorce. You will have to sit down with him/her and make sure to identify all the issues that might come up in the divorce. Having a list of things like assets that might be contested or other issues that could be a problem, this makes a remarkably solid starting point. It would also be advantageous to know what it is you need as well as what you can do without. Your divorce attorney will help you to get the things that are critical priorities for you.

The difference between priorities changing throughout a relationship and knowing what priorities you have during the divorce may be related to each other, or even the source of the divorce. The division of assets will probably be a key component to the divorce. The attorney will be able to help to get this and other issues taken care of as long as they know what your priorities are. Make sure that you discuss every aspect of marriage and just what you feel you need to take away from it, so that they will be able to help you best.

Often children are a key priority for one spouse more than the other this may be where the attorney will have to step in, and be sure that there is a safe visitation set up with the custodial parent. Support and both financially and emotionally are something that needs to be a priority during a divorce. Having a strong support system whether it is family or a support group, that deals with people going through this stress. When people go through a life changing event such as a divorce, their priorities could change yet again. This time they will be more one sided or include children and the custodial parent alone.
