Article published on February 17th 2012 | Hobby

The idea of hunting for game is a very appealing notion to many, but what these unsuspecting enthusiasts are not always immediately aware of, is the need for a significant amount of gear and equipment, to not only comply with rules and regulations, but also to maximize potential success rates. Many people choose to go hunting together, making the occasion something of a social gathering, and this is perfectly acceptable where ducks are concerned, unlike other hunted species, where the hunter needs to be alone. The duck hunting fraternity often learn the ropes in pairs and the first thing to grasp is the clothing to wear, which if you are in pairs or more, is always advisable to wear as near to the same as possible, in order to help blend in with the local surroundings.

The basics of the required equipment start naturally with the actual weapon, which ought to be a 12-gauge chambered shotgun, with any high power shell proving sufficient, but these must be steel, as lead is prohibited. An absolute necessity are a good pair of waders, they are essential to reach places that otherwise would prove inaccessible. Hip waders are fine, but ideally chest-high waders make life so much easier. Even in reasonably shallow water, they are great for keeping the bottom dry, as it makes for an uncomfortable day if you need to sit down wet.

Of the many duck hunting tips that do the rounds, one that certainly is worth taking on board is paying that little bit extra for a good quality pair of waders. Cheap versions can be picked up, but you will be left cold, damp and probably ready for home in double quick time. A little more expense paid out, will keep you warm, dry and enthusiastic throughout the day. Camouflage is also vital and many make the mistake of dressing in army-style green, when realistically brown will do the trick. That will blend in better with most surroundings, because ducks are not stupid, they can quickly recognize if something does not quite look right, and they will be out of there before you can even raise your gun.

Decoys and duck calls are very popular as they allow a hunter to get much closer to the target. There has even been a development with the decoys in the shape of a type of robo-duck which can actually dip and dive and create ripple effects to mirror the real thing. The calls come in many shapes and sizes, but fundamentally, they are able to replicate the sounds of the ducks, be that just chatter, perhaps mating, or warnings of imminent danger. Ducks are deceptive in their size, and many hunters make the mistake of shooting at the birds when they are far to far away. Anything above 35 to 40 yards away is probably too great a distance, and should not be attempted.

Duck hunting is a fantastic past time and one that if you decide to pursue, really needs to be taken seriously, to gain the most from it. Approaching the activity half-hearted will do nobody any favours. It can be very rewarding and anybody taking it up will quickly begin to appreciate the skill levels required, and once mastered, the sense of achievement that follows a successful hunt.

Article Source:
http://www.articleside.com/hobby-articles/perfectly-equipped-for-the-duck-hunt.htm - Article Side

Anne Mary - About Author:
It is always best to find out as much as possible about duck hunting and at a www.duckhuntinginfo.com there is significant information to digest. Amongst the many items are some excellent a duck hunting tips that can transform individual success rates.

Article Keywords:
duck hunting, duck hunting tips, duck hunting info, duck hunting techniques

You can find more free articles on Article Side. Sign up today and share your knowledge to the community! It is completely FREE!