Baron and Budd: Seeing You Through by Jim Edward

Article published on February 24th 2012 | Law

Mesothelioma is a form of cancer that has been linked to asbestos exposure. It does not just affect the lungs; it can also manifest itself in the abdomen or the heart. This illness normally takes decades to develop, making it hard to diagnose in the earliest stages. This is further augmented by the fact that its symptoms may mimic those of common diseases such as the flu, bronchitis, or other common ailments.

Estimates peg the number of new mesothelioma cases in the United States around a staggering 3,000 each year. This disease may affect people of various ages and from different occupations. After all, a person may not need to have direct exposure to asbestos to develop mesothelioma. Breathing in asbestos particles from the environment or from someone's contaminated clothes may be enough to develop this illness. The high number of new cases may also be due, in part, to the wide use of this material in past decades. Because of its unique properties, asbestos was extensively used in the textile industry, the construction industry, in shipbuilding, and in general manufacturing of several other kinds of products; such as brake pads or insulation.

The treatment of mesothelioma is a long and arduous process. It can take its toll on both the victim and their family. Not only does it require physical and emotional strength, but it may also take much in terms of financial capacity.

If you suspect that yourself, or a loved one, may have contracted mesothelioma from occupational asbestos exposure, you don't have to fight this battle alone. Aside from focusing on the treatment, you might want to contact experienced mesothelioma attorneys for guidance with your asbestos claim. Keep in mind that litigation is not an easy task, but having experienced mesothelioma attorneys by your side can definitely make it easier.

When looking for mesothelioma attorneys, consider Baron and Budd, P.C. This precedent-setting law firm has an extensive track record in handling asbestos-related claims.
