Train Your Dogs the Right Way by Madison Odalys

Article published on April 14th 2012 | Pets

Some dog trainers make the mistake of bribing their dogs to respond to their commands. If your dog gets used to getting a treat before responds to your commands well, it will not perform a command unless a treat is there. Giving treats to your dog should not be an everyday affair in order to prevent the risk of bribery.

Not all dogs are adept at responding to voice command. Most working dogs respond more to hand signal and whistles. A deaf dog can be trained using verbal signals. It is not enough to train your dog to obey your every command as you will also have to get it to love you as well. A relationship between you and your dog that is based on love and trust can enhance your training sessions. If your dog is terrified of you, training it may not be a raving success.

The extent to which you are successful as a dog handler depends on your ability to get your dog to understand you and your commands. More often than not, commands that dogs donâ€™t respond to are those that are not clear. If you want your dog to respond favorably to your commands, try not to get your wires crossed.

Sometimes, keeping your dog on a leash is the best form of dog training. Some dogs are overly excited and tend to hurt people in a fit to excitement unless they are trained. Training your dog through the leash has proved quite effective for many dog owners.

Teaching your dogs how to perform tricks keeps it busy. You may decide to train your dog for the purpose of entertainment just as circus dog owners do. Whatever reason you have for training your dog to perform tricks, ensure that you donâ€™t put it under any undue pressure.

The choke collar is a training tool for dogs that is usually applied to communicate your displeasure to your dog when it exhibits undesirable behavior. The choke collar is the length of a chain with a large circular ring on the other end and is a good dog training tool. The choke collar tightens on your dogâ€™s neck when you give it a tug thereby letting your dog know that what it is doing is not acceptable.
